LOCOMOTIVES.

THE FOLLOWING VALUABLE AND INTERESTING Articles is from Zerah Colbura's new paper, the Railread Advocation. The Advocation of the locomotive has been wonderful. Frem in the carliest and meat primitive concition, it has attained to new forms, new proportions and new and vastly increased usefulness. Side by side, also, with its own progress and improvement have been that of the now mammont establishments, devoted to its construction. A wide interest attaches to this great advancement, in both the imanufacture and the manufactory. In the great works which form the subject of our present notice, the locomotive has been originated, and matured its most varied and "landle forms, and its provided last properties of the control of the cont stories in height. Adjoining is the tank shop, 30 by 100 feet. In this building is also a ten-horse power steam engine.

The boiler shop extends, as a part of the above building, to Fairview street. It is 80 by 100 feet in extent. The truck, tank and boiler shops form the lower story of one large building, the upper part of which is occupied for pattern shops.

The erecting, or "setting-up shops," are on the northwest corner of Hamilton and Sevent teenth streets. They cover a space of 179 feet by 130 feet; and consist of two buildings, each two stories in height, 179 by 50 feet in plan, and separated by an open passage way of 30 feet width.

In each of these buildings are twelve tracks, running across the width of the building, and upon which, in each building, as many locomotives may stand. In the building, which is devoted to patting together the various parts of the engines, there are water pipes, traveling, hoisting apparatus, and smoae-jacks over each track, so that an engine may be filled, raised, and firedup, on any track in the building.

Opposite each track, in each building, a large door opens into the open thirty feet space. A permanent track runs down the whole length of this space or court, upon which is a stont track, thirty feet way thus be moved ac as to stand opposite to any track of one building, after which an engine may be run out upon it, to be placed upon any track of the other building. It necessary, an engine can also be changed from one to another track of the same building.

placed upon any track of the other building. If necessary, an engine can also be changed from one to another track of the same building.

One of these buildings is devoted wholly to putting together the heavier parts of the engines, setting the tubes, "fixing up" and testing the engines, &c., while the other to complet for painting and triuming the engines, and for boxing their machinery for transportation, in the completing room is also a heavy track scale, upon tubes, "Fing up" and testing the engines, &c., while the other "Occupied for painting and trimming the engines, and for boxing their machinery for transportation. In the completing room is also a heavy track scale, upon which any engine may be weighed, with or without steam, and entire, or on each pair of whoels.

These are the only works, to our knowledge, having scales for weighing locomotives. With the number and variety of engines built here, and by constant weighings, the amount and distribution of weight, in any plan of engine, can always be foretold with great accuracy. This saves many disappointments and embarrassmonis otherwise likely of occurrence, in delivering engines having more or less weight, or a different distribution than that stipulated in the contracts.

Near the creating shops is a large building on Hamilton and Fairview streets, 200 by 254 feet, and occupied with a stationary engine of 100 horse power, additional smithshops, stables, coal sheds, &c.

The principal blacksmiths' shop is on the corner of Seventeenth and Fairview streets, and is 116 by 135 feet, containing 46 smiths' fires and 3 trip-hammers. This building is separated by a large yard from the principal fluiding those, the latter extending 16e feet on Seventeenth and 155 feet on Morris street. In this building is a 70 horse power engine, driving all the machinery of the blacksmiths' and inishing shops.

The iron and brass foundries, carpenters' shops, grind-stone, paint and engraving shops, are contained in a separate building, 70 by 103 feet, adjoining the counting room, drawing offices and store rooms on Seventeenth and engraving shops, are contained in a separate building, 70 by 103 feet, adjoining the counting room, drawing offices and store rooms on Seventeenth stores.

These works are sufficient in extent and sufficiently equipped with machinery for the employment of 1,400 men, and the production of 180 engines yearly.

The proprietors contemplate further enlargements, however, and the lumber, window frames and other por the premises, to await a favorable change in the times, which for the past year have proved very depressing to locomotive building as well as to most other branches of business.

Euch is the extent of these works. They include all the original works occupied by William Norris at the first establishment of the business; and include allow recent and extensive enlargement. The internal arrangement of the works is very convenient and systematic. The whole establishment is also near the line of the Reading railroad, which thus affords a convenient means of delivering engines upon any railroad, or upon any wharf in the city. The coal, and much of the fron used at the works, arrives also by the same road.

The tools and machinery of the works are generally of a very excellent kind, adapted to the most rapid excention of the several portions of the work. Many of the tools have been built at the works, and are especially adapted to peculiar portions of the engines. Among the tools made outside of the works are a very excellent serw-planing machines, and a heavy radial drill, from Joseph Whitworth & Co.'s Works, of Minochester, Eogland; also shaping machines, slotting machines, and athes, (some of the heaviest class,) from Rement, lougherty, and Thomas; Gage, Warner, and Whitney and from manufacturers in New York city, Worcester Massachusetts, and other places.

The construction of the hocomotives built at these works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works commands equal interest to that attaching to the works construction of the engine. ance is thereby attained than by any other builders, the dimension of width being considered to be much more influential than those of length or depth, in the production of steam.

The tubes, usually of copper, have copper rings, brazed on their outsides at each end. This gives a uniform opening on the inside of the tube, and also a better thickness for making the joint of the tube in the tube sheet. It dispenses, also, with thimbles, thus leaving the draft unobstructed.

The fastening of the cylinders is made upon the frame, and upon a stout cast iron bed plate, resting upon the frame, and open as the cylinders is made upon a stout cast iron bed plate, resting upon the frame, and forming the bottom and flat sides of the smoke box. Without great weight, this gives a very permanent fastening, much more so than when the cylinders are merely fastened to the frame, and to the this wrought from adds of a square smoke box.

The frames, as well as the axies, equalizing levers, centre beams and other heavy forged parts are made at the works from long steap from. The frames have their nedestals and truss braces welded in, as parts of one and the same piece. The truck frames are forged throughout as a single piece, the frame not only being forged square, but the pedestals and braces being forged solid thereto.

Many of the truck wheels used at these works, are of a peculiar pattern, not in use elsewhere, and which ensures equal and simultaneous contraction in cooling, immediately after being cast. The wheel is solid and of the spoke form, the spokes being connected with the hub in such manner as to leave oval openings near the coating of chay around the cores prevents actual childing of the iron.

The running machinery of the engines is very simple and strong. The rocker arms, lifting arms, and all other parts of the vive motion, are of wrought tron, forged very stout.

The running machinery of the engines is very simple and strong. The rocker arms, lifting arms, and all other parts of the valve motion, are of wrought irron, forged very stout.

The tires of the driving wheels are exclusively of Lowmoor iron, bent and welded at these worss. The tires are so accurately bent to the circular form as to fit the wheels closely at every point without boring, thus avoiding the expense of boring, and the loss of iron thereby.

There are severalleading principles observed in the administration of these works, which appear calculated to ensure their highest efficiency, and the best quality in their productions.

One is the manufacture, upon the spot, not only of the engines, but, as far as possible, of the materials also of which they are composed. All the forged work, tires, tubes, springs, brass and iron castings, chilled wheels, and other parts often purchased outside of other works, are here made in the best manner, and with the aid of every fixture to be found in the establishments supplying separately each of these items.

Another is the greatest possible substitution of machinery for manual labor. In these works, a smaller proportion of the men are engaged in handwork than in any other similar establishment in the country.

This circumstance is due to the fact that the tools are adapted, in a special manner, to the execution of each portion of the work, and that each class of tools is specially appropriated to distinct portions of work.

Another is the entire independence of the different departments of the works from each other. Hardly any two distinct branches of labor are carried on together in the same apartment; and, at the same time, there is the utmost facility for all necessary communication between the separate departments.

In the materials used for the engines, wrought iron is used wherever practicable, and to the exclusion of each of the same and the server of the dimensions in detail of every construction of engine printed blanks are filled out for the foremen of the
